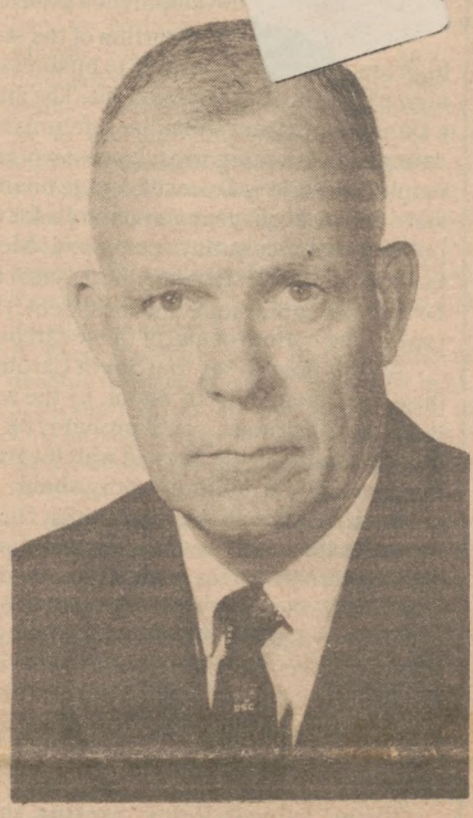
The politicization of USC

Patterson to resign, reorganization considered

Patterson ... to exit?



Marchant ... entering?

by Doug Williams

The announcement may not evoke the same controversy as did that of his predecessor.

But persons close to the University of South Carolina indicate that Dr. William Patterson will step down as University president at the end of the coming academic year. Patterson, meanwhile, is non-committal about the date of his departure. But sources familiar with Patterson's situation expect an announcement concerning his plans by September.

Patterson will leave the office having achieved neither the role of hero nor that of villain. Rather, his brief tenure will have been nothing more than another scene in one of the state's longest-running, all-consuming power plays -- and an inevitable result of the increasing politicization of South Carolina's largest university.

One gets the idea that Patterson never really wanted to be president. "I was perfectly content doing what I was doing," he says freely of his former role as provost of the school. "I probably would have been just as happy to remain the No. 2 man."

It was a classic example of being in the right place at the right time. After the extraordinary and abrupt resignation of Dr. Thomas F. Jones in 1974, T. Eston Marchant, chairman of the USC Board of Trustees, said, "The best-qualified man was right under our noses, so to speak."

And, some critics of the seemingly orchestrated change in the school's administration charged, right under the collective thumb of a politically motivated board and the South Carolina General Assembly. While Marchant, board members and then-Gov. John C. West simply cast aside allegations of political collusion in Jones' resignation as mere rumor, the episode painfully illustrated the grim reality that the university, in the words of one board member, has become a "political entity."

> "...Patterson's resignation should come as no real surprise to followers of university politics. It was generally conceded at the time of his appointment that he would not head the university system for an extended period..."

Patterson's resignation should come as no real surprise to followers of university politics. It was generally conceded at the time of his appointment that he would not head the university system for an extended period, primarily because of his age -- 63. Certainly, Jones' 11-year reign is remarkable when compared with the administrative lifespan of the average college president. Furthermore, as reorganization of the school's top positions became nearer to fact and further from theory, the necessity of a president with political and business -- not education -- connections also became evident. And Patterson, said some critics (who assailed the new president over the General Assembly's $5.5-million cutback in the university's 1975-76 budget), lacks the political savvy and clout of a Tom Jones.

Apparently, however, Jones' clout meant little when weighed against the strength of his opponents. For Jones often confided to associates that while friends come and go, enemies accumulate. And accumulate they did. Whether it was because of his innovative ideas concerning education or his overassertion in the role of the school's chief executive, Jones found himself faced with people who just didn't understand him or his policies.

"In essence, he was fired," says one member of the university hierarchy. Denials by West, Marchant and virtually everyone else involved that the former president's resignation letter of Jan. 24, 1974, stressed that it was written without any pressure from the board, the General Assembly or the governor. (In fact, it has been reported that West was approached by board member Michael J. Mungo on Jan. 21 -- three days before the official date of Jones' letter and a full week before the resignation intent was made public -- and warned that unless the president was informed of activities against him, Mungo would disclose the entire story. At a Feb. 5 press conference at Carolina Coliseum, West said that he had had no previous knowledge of Jones' resignation. Beyond that, Sig Huitt of University Information Services said on Jan. 27 that he had been working on the press release to accompany Jones' letter for five days.)

The swirling charges and allegations have never developed into a concrete story. Yet the events -- and certain rather ugly occurrences since then -- have assured the University of South Carolina of its role in power politics; two headstrong opposites drawn strangely together by a force that is beyond us all.

Patterson -- as probably is the case with any other president of a state-supported institution -- acknowledges that "I have never been in any position to ignore the hand that feeds me," meaning, of course, the General Assembly. He says that Mungo's assessment of the university as a political entity is reasonably valid. "It (the university) was created by the General Assembly and supported by the General Assembly through appropriations," Patterson says.

Marchant cloaks it in more explicit terms: a state-supported university -- any state-supported university -- is directly related to the people who pass the laws to finance the school's operations. "We are a creature of the General Assembly," he says flatly. Of that, there can be no question. For not only does about half of the university's nearly $90-million budget come from the state coffers, but the entire Board of Trustees also is made up of elected members, 16 of whom are selected directly by the General Assmbly. Says Marchant: "I don't know whether it is good or not; it depends on how you look at it. The institution is responsive to the public demands. What better response than through duly elected members?"

Although Patterson may be unable to see himself in the position of ignoring the hand that feeds him, there have been instances where the hand that has fed his educational family has also bitten it. And rather badly. For example, there was the dismal episode in September 1975 over grading procedures at the university law school. State Sen. Edward E. Saleeby, D-Darlington, and others charged that an anonymous grading system used during the law school's trial summer program had been violated; they complained that the law school faculty gave lower grades to students who had political connections.

Fourteen students involved in that program, which requires candidates to maintain a 2.0 grade point average in order to enroll in law school in the fall and which included the sons of Saleeby and U.S. Sen. Ernest F. Hollings, failed to meet the academic standard. The Board of Trustees lowered the requirement to 1.66, thus, in

THE Political economy BY ED MEADOWS

The fifth-ranked state

A consulting firm has reported that South Carolina ranks fifth among states that are favorable to businessmen. Need I say it? As soon as the news got out, the sundry functionaries of the state's establishment rushed into print with masturbatory exercises in self-adulation. Editorials across the region quickly took up the theme that South Carolina is a wonderful place, thanks mainly to our glorious state leaders, who, of course, have striven for economic progress while beating back the dark forces of Organized Labor.

Hugh Aiken, chief of the state Chamber of Commerce, sset the fruity tone of the congratulatory rhetoric. For example, he said, "South Carolina's favorable ranking did not just happen. It was because state and local governments, civic and trade associations, and the citizenry as a whole dedicated themselves to making economic development a priority issue."

What outrageous distortion of the study's results! South Carolina ranked high among states favorable to business mostly because of its poverty and the niggardliness of its government. The study, prepared by the Fantus Company, a Dun & Bradstreet subsidiary, found that South Carolina has an "excellent" rating in these categories: Lowest workman's compensation benefits paid per employed worker; Lowest average unemployment compensation rate; Lowest state and local government payrolls for functions other than education; Least public assistance outlays per capita; Most labor laws favorable to industry; Lowest per capita state and local taxes: Lowest per capita property taxes paid; Lowest per capita state and local debt. (Now notice that South Carolina doesn't rank at the bottom of any of these categories.)

All this goes to say that South Carolina spends little money on the poor and disadvantaged, most of whom, by the way, are white. If you're wealthy, and a touch parsimonious, you'll probably be pleased. But all the report is demonstrating is the age-old watchword of Southern government: to hell with the poor. This is nothing to brag about.

But that's not all the report tells. Our wonderful editorialists and politicos haven't said much about the Fantus Company's accompanying studies of "characteristics of the population" and "facilities for living." The former shows that: the state's selective service rejection rate has been highest of all 50 states; average school years attended is rated near the bottom, at 48.5 out of 50 states; percent of those eligible to vote is again at the bottom, number 47th of the 50 states; South Carolina ranks 42.5 among the states in percent of families earning less than $3,000 a year. In these categories, and overall in the "characteristics of the population" ranking, South Carolina scored "fair to poor."

In the "living facilities" ranking, the state has a "poor" average student-teacher ratio, rated 42nd in the nation; In education expenses per pupil, it ranked, "fair" at number 36 out of 50 states; Park acreage per 1,000 persons is rated lowest in the nation; number of physicians per 1,000 is, at 42nd rank, among the lowest in the country; and so it goes. Overall, again South Carolina scored in the "fair to poor" range for the "living facilities" study.

Permeating the Fantus report, and in fact what gives South Carolina its "high" score, is the state's traditional antipathy to organized labor. South Carolina rated "excellent" in the realm of labor legislation favorable to management, and that chiefly because it has a right-to-work law. What this means is that, in South Carolina, business has virtually complete freedom to exploit workers. They've been doing that for years and the result is the bottom-of-the-ladder per capita income in the state, textile workers uncompensated for brown lung disease, untold abuses against working people (who've traditionally been fired for any suspicions of union activity). All this has been very profitable for the state's industrialists. They get the cheapest possible American labor. No doubt they'd like to keep the state just the way it is. Thus the lavish self-praise by their mouthpieces in the state's news media.

However, one cannot expect the situation to stay so static. No matter how fearful and no matter how ignorant of their own interests the state's workers may be, change has a way of coming. And in South Carolina, it may come sooner than many will find comfortable. That's because the newly-consolidated Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union is launching a grand cause celebre to finally organize Southern textile workers. The new union, composed of what used to be the Textile Workers Union of America and the Amalgamated Clothing Workers Union, has a membership of 550,000, and it plans a massive boycott of non-union textile products, principally those made by the J.P. Stevens Co.

Speculating on punditry

Predictions are fun but tricky in the pundit business -- they are an occupational hazard that ought to be resisted but never are. It is temptation to come right out now and say that Jummy Carter will win by a landslide next November 2 (for better or worse). But shall I actually commit myself to that? Remember election eve four years ago!

The crowd looked at Spiro Agnew at his campaign headquarters and chanted jubilantly, "Twelve more years, twelve more years!" meaning that he would follow his beloved leader Richard Nixon with two terms of his own after 1976. And Time magazine in a special predicted edition, November 20, announced "And Now, Here's Spiro...for '76." Yes, the magazine predicted, "recent history favors his chances... the odds now are with Agnew if for no other reason than the fact that he is the favorite of the GOP conservatives who...control the Republican Party."

Conservatives still do control the Republican party and Spiro did win a victory in a sense, he is not in jail: and now we are in another election, making new forecasts which may be as fallible as their predecessors. The extraordinary thing to this observer is how casual we are about it: the most powerful country and the most powerful leader and so few participate.

Italian elections come this weekend (June 20-21) and 95 percent of the voters will vote, maybe more, because of the intense interest in the Communist drive to knock out the Christian Democrats and embarrass the Pope. Compare that with the U.S. voting average in the wearisome 31 state primaries we have just been through. It is estimated that 25 million Americans voted and the customary quadrennial post-primary paens arise "Those Messy Primaries Worked Well" (Time, June 21). Similar smug editorials appear over the country. We can relax; somehow or other our system (in spite of Nixon, in spite of Agnew, in spite of everything) pulls us through, God looks after America.

The latest census shows 150 million Americans -- 18 years old or older -- eligible to veot, so that the 25 million who participated in the primaries are a small fraction -- about 1 in 6 or 16 percent. Most of us, at first anyway, had little idea who was running or why. In the beauty contest voters picked the captain of the Ship of State not on his knowledge of navigation but on his hearty manner. It has left us for the final stage with a choice between Jimmy Carter, the Great Who-is-he? and the Ford-Reagan Right Wing Twins. When the ultimate comes next November it is estimated that 50 percent of voters will vote -- 75 million will be missing.

We don't have a Communist challenge to spur us like Italy, but other democracies have larger turnouts than we do, too; Great Britain's latest was 71 percent; Canada - 74; Ireland - 75; Netherlands - 83; France - 82; Australia (compulsory) - 97. Are they better educated, or more civic minded? No, but the political game there has different rules: it's less boring; elections are shorter; registration easier; parties are stronger; and parliament, not the electorate, picks the ultimate leader, who has been seasoned in the legislature.

If Jimmy Carter wins he will have an extraordinary degree of freedom to enact a program, and about 180 days to do it. He may restore the white House press conference (Mr. Ford has held only one formal conference this year(. He will have a Democratic majority - perhaps a big one - effect, admitting the students itself. In the outrage that followed, it was feared that the law school could lose its national accreditation if the board's decision was allowed to stand. On Sept. 13, the board released a statement reaffirming the action, though adding a provision that called for the students' withdrawal if accreditation was threatened.

An American Bar Association accreditation panel was called in and ruled that the law school should have the right to say who is admitted. The law school faculty asked that the 11 students who actually entered be withdrawn, and Patterson acted in accordance with that request.

Dean Robert W. Foster of the law school agrees that one would suspect politics was involved, but states that there is no proof. He does concede, however, that politics has become a part of the educational process. "Any entity that receives support from legislative appropriations is going to be a political entity," he says. "Are we concerned about the actions of the legislature? Damn right. It's our bread and butter. But do people get into the law school through politics? No. Every state-supported university is dependent on appropriation of funds to survive and prosper. How could it be any other way? It's just a fact."

Foster is not bitter over the incident. "Bitter is a different word than regret," he says. "I'm not satisfied that we had to go through it. The trustees made their decision without communicating with us. I have always thought that the role of the trustees was administrative policy -- the hiring and firing of presidents. I'm afraid they don't always see their role."

"It was an unfortunate action on the part of the board," Patterson admits. "They thought they had good reasons behind it. Unfortunately, politicians' children were involved." However, he adds quickly that the board "realized the academic integrity of the university" was at stake by later reversing itself.

Says Foster, who will soon take a leave from the university to go abroad: "Students were concerned over the admissions problem. This (the board's reversal) should give them confidence."

Shortly after the law school controversy, Patterson found himself in the middle of another political tug-of-war. Dr. William N. Adams-Smith, who later resigned as the university's vice president for health affairs and as interim medical school dean, charged political interference in the university's Faculty Senate to answer the allegations, at which time the president defended politics as a necessity in operating the college: "Money means much to us and we need strong fiscal support."

In 1974, Adams-Smith had recommended Dr. John B. Harley as permanent dean of the medical school. However, Harley lasted just two months and -- "at Adams-Smith's suggestion," Patterson said -- resigned, costing the university more than $50,000 in contracted wages. When the question of Harley's repalcement arose, Adams-Smith charged that his recommendation was passed over in favor of a "low-country physician," and that Patterson had agreed with his suggestion before changing his mind after a board of trustees advisory committee discussed the "relative merits" of each man. Adams-Smith further contended that the discussions focused more on political contacts than on medical-administrative abilities.

> "...Mungo suggests that such reorganization would take politics out of education. 'The president would work completely off campus,' he says..."

Adams-Smith had recommended Dr. A.D. Merritt, professor and chairman of medical genetics at the University of Indiana School of Medicine in Indianapolis, to replace Harley. Patterson said that if Merritt had been hired, the new dean's wife would have been included in an arrangement that would have paid her $45,000 annually -- roughly $10,000 more than the vice president who would have been her supervisor. The president also conceded that he was leery of Adams-Smith's recommendation because of the incident with Harley .

The "low-country physician" of whom Adams-Smith spoke -- Dr. Vince Moseley of the Medical School of Charleston -- was never approached with an offer; he was ruled out because of a question concerning his physical stamina. The medical school still is without a permanent dean.

Patterson allows that there were some political considerations in the attempted selection of a dean. "I felt that a person who understands the political scene in South Carolina probably would have had an easier time operating our medical school," he says now. "He would have had his connections in South Carolina, therefore would have had more political influence than someone from Timbuktu. Those people at the medical school see it now."

Mungo was a bit more blunt. "He is absolutely wrong," the trustee said of Adams-Smith. "He doesn't understand the American system of government. He apparently went off his damned rocker." Adams-Smith has refused to fire any parting shots concerning the conflict. In so many words, he has simply said, let the facts speak for themselves.

While these wounds have healed, the scars still remain. The underlying problems show no signs of subsiding, either, as education becomes more and more seduced by the power and wealth of politics. And the result of the seduction will inevitably be some form of reorganization of the university's top administration.

Mungo is actively campaigning for a chancellor-president system, under which there would be an off-campus president of the university system to work with the General Assembly, raise money from alumni and handle athletic problems, and an on-campus academic chancellor. (Foster notes that this would not be much different from what the university now has in practice. "There has always been some adherence to legislative intent," he says. "And we have a provost who could be considered the equivalent of a chief academic officer. The personalities of the people involved are more important than titles.")

The university system in South Carolina has reached a point where the conversion to such a system must occur, Mungo contends. "There are few Ph.D.s who can run a $100-million-a-year organization," he says. "Once a university reaches this size -- it is the second largest industry in South Carolina -- it has a tremendous economic impact." And, he stresses, since the university deals with state funds, "it has an obligation to the taxpayer."

Furthermore, he suggests that such a reorganization would take the politics out of education. "The president would work completely off campus," he says. The chancellor would be given the opportunity to operate without political restraints. He would be "a guy who won't be faced with politics." Mungo adds: "It really is the only way to function. It enhances the academic environment." Mungo, who says he has "not one iota of evidence" as to who Patterson's successor might be, has a personal choice in John E. Swearingen, Jr., chairman of the board of Standard Oil Co. of Indiana and a 1938 graduate of the University of South Carolina whose father John Sr. was the state's superintendent of education from 1908 - 1922. "He was a brilliant man," Mungo says of Swearingen "He would bring stature to the university. He's the sort of person we'd want."

Patterson seems to agree, in theory, with the concept of a chancellor-president. "We almost need a ceremonial man for this job," he says of the presidency. "He would be a ceremonial president while the chancellor would run it."

In addition to hearing Mungo's proposals if they are brought before the board's September meeting, the trustees will also be considering a report by a hired management consultant that involves restructuring of the university's top administrative positions: the president, the vice president and the provost and their staffs. No one would be fired through such a restructuring, however; the positions presumably would be abolished through attrition.

Yet this restructuring presents another problem, particularly if the board leaned toward Mungo's proposal. And perhaps that is why Marchant does not seem to share Mungo's fervor for reorganization. "Nothing has evolved yet except discussion," he says. "There has got to be some degree of reorganization. We will have further discussions in September; we have to get some more firm recommendations."

For in addition to Swearingen, West and former governor Robert McNair (though insiders believe it is doubtful McNair would leave his lucrative Columbia law practice), Eston Marchant has been named as a possible candidate for the university presidency. He casts such speculation aside as rumor. "I am not a candidate," he says. "I have never so indicated. I am not seeking the office, nor is anyone seeking it on my behalf." Marchant still offers no comment on Patterson's resignation. "Dr. Patterson has not announce any plans to leave," he insists Marchant does not have the business connections or national prominence that would be required of the president under Mungo's plan. While he is presently in his third two-year term as chairman, he does not have a background in education. ("I have no opinion on having a non-educator as president," he says, "since I would be one of the ones involved, I assume, in the selection of a new president."). But Eston Marchant has a fair amount of political power in his corner. Whether it would be enough to offset the intended goals of reorganization is impossible to say at this point.

So the power games are bound to continue, as candidates and non-candidates joust for position. And what of the student? Mungo, who says student fears of political dominance are "more of a spectre than a reality," contends that bringing a non-educator to the university would work for the student betterment. He sees the president as a "bulwark," standing between the politicians and the student; the more the student can be isolated from political pressures, the better. "We want to eliminate politics from the student," he says. "He (the student) is the ultimate product."

Even Patterson says that the student benefits from the university's political bent, particularly in the area of costs. "Look at what he pays as opposed to a private school," the president says. "He gains far more than he loses."

Maybe so. But it remains to be seen whether the advent of the political entity will make the student something of a non-entity. For the student pays his money and takes his chances, while the powers-to-be pull his educational and purse strings. He is like a center on a football team; it is up to him to set the play in motion. Then he gets trampled in the ensuing mad rush; the mad rush that more often than not knocks him over while the ball carriers get all the fame -- and good fortune.

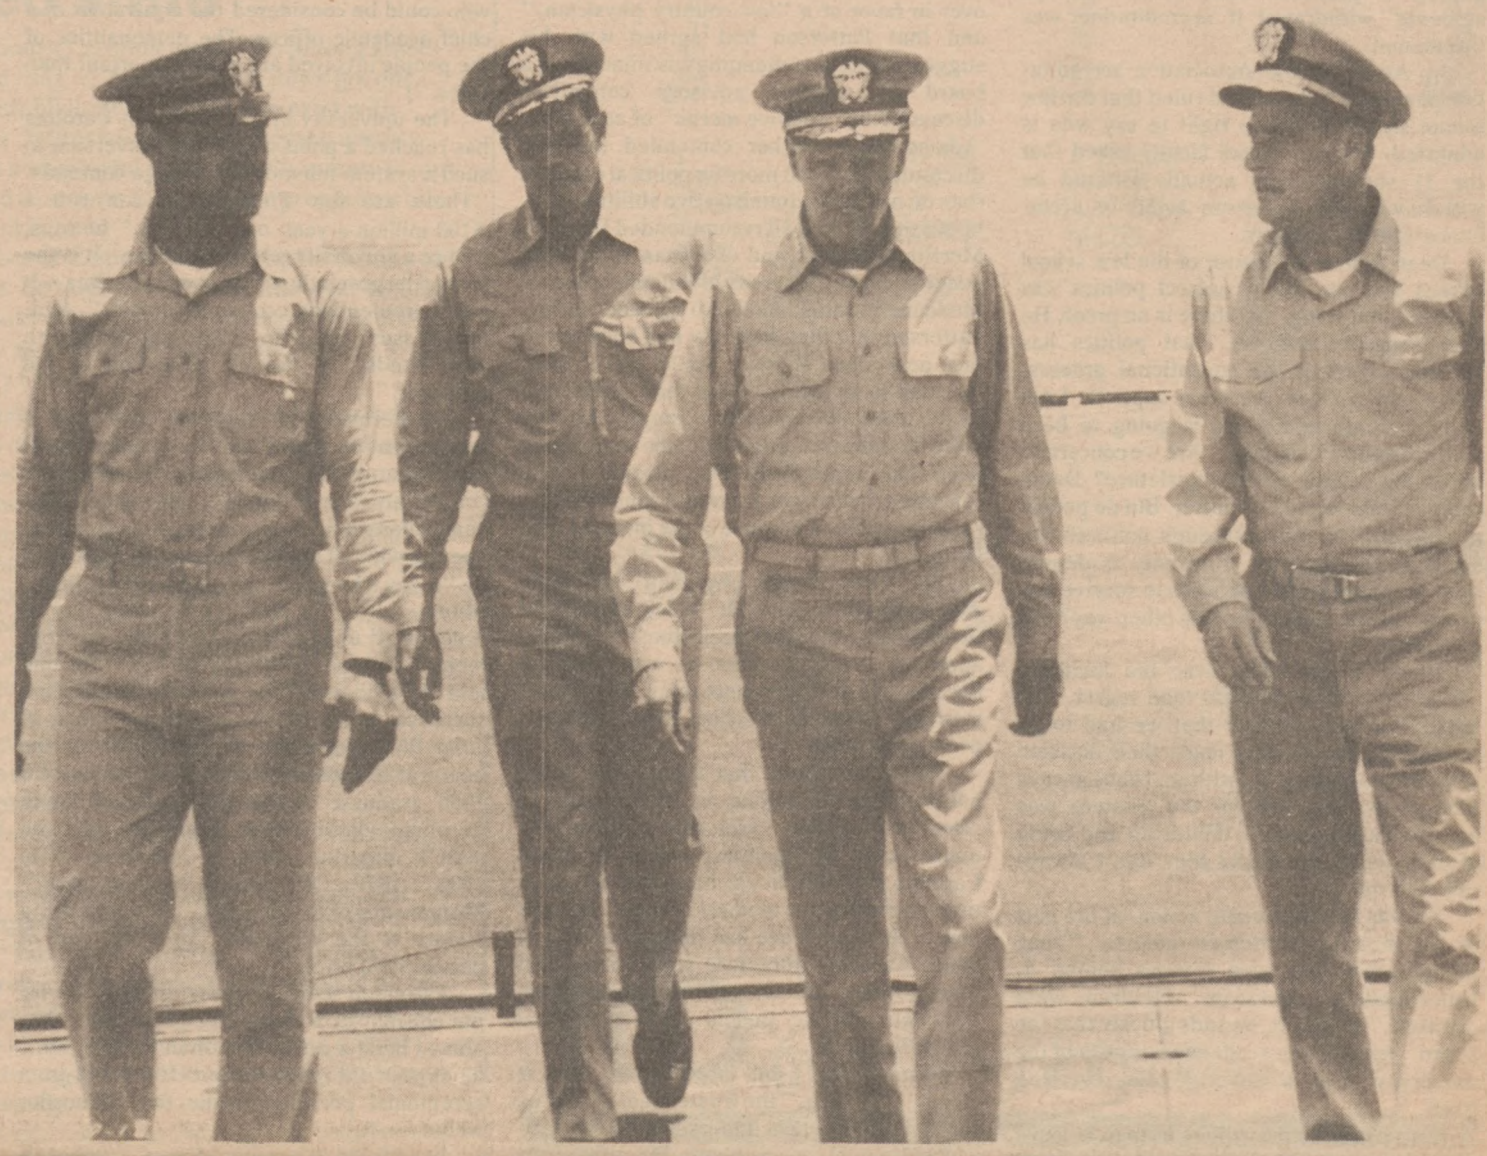
Monday afternoon at the movies



Footballer Larry Csonka, Charlton Heston, Henry Fonda and Robert Webber in "Midway"

MIDWAY
At the Richland Mall Theatre

It being hot, and Monday, I went to the movies. What better reprieve than to sit comfortably for an afternoon, air conditioned, sipping a fifty cent Coke. And America up there on the screen, our grand America doing what she does best -- fighting.

Bionic bicentennial Amurrica. We have the technology.... Enough to blow up an entire Japanese armada. Enough to recreate the same in Sensurround.

Enough to send us home with confidence, secure that if need be America can (she will) rise to the occasion.

This occasion is Midway, the battle of. America as underdog, scrappy feisty dog, the New York Jets of '68.

America is also the Big Purple Machine. She works the hardest, gets the job done. Not only a scrappy and spirited, but capable, orgaized, well-honed. Developed in the most advanced respectable science: meatgrinding.

Dad spent many a crisp clear Saturday afternoon fixed to the radio when he should have been out raking the leaves, cheering on the likes of the Wolfpack or Crimson Tide This is the same man who whipped the Nips. Granddad whipped the Huns.

The Nips did it to Pearl, the Huns did it to Belgium. There has to be some injustice, some heinous wrong to right: justification for sending in the boys to fry the enemy. So we can scream and whistle and stamp our feet when the third enemy carrier is mashed.

The football mentality takes hold: there is an enemy: all those boys in uniform can get off the barstools, get their hands out of their pockets and take to the almightly business of war. Football is just for the off-season.

I've got to tell you this up front: I liked the movie, I enjoyed it. I had a good time. While I'm confessing -- I've been through The Killer Angels, the Blue Max, the World at War. Combat and Frank Capra. I saw "Tora! Tora! Tora!" Twice twice. I'm a Woodrow Wilson fan. I once mapped out Napoleon's Italian campaign.

I have been conditioned to accept that war, inevitable, is a business that must be given all our resources. It's the American tradition, the national stimulus.

The film Midway concentrates mainly on the high command. We know our boys in the trenches and in the air and down below are going to do their jobs the best they can be done: that's in our hearts, we can depend on them. It's the commanders and the chiefs we're worried about.

The film digs into this: what it's like to be the leader, to be responsible. To be just as human as the swabbies, but because of their position, what is seemingly insignificant is significant to them. Everything matters. Minor details win or lose major encounters.

Worrying about everything frazzles these men. They seem to have a reluctance, call it caution, to make the necessary decisions. Like Henry Fonda. But Henry knows: war calls for hard line gut-sucking.

The Pacific is his arena, his gameboard. He figures every angle, takes every precedent into accord. He listens to advice. He considers the human element. Every means our technology affords, he uses. Then, it's time. Once the mind is made up (Americans), they execute.

So who has been called to portray these roles? Hollywood's gray and aged, of course: Glenn Ford, Heston himself, Fonda, Hal Holbrook. Robert Mitchum. Important men. Men that matter.

Ford is so good at making his face, we never really notice that all he does is sit in his command chair with his legs crossed. Listening intently to the air war over radio.

Holbrook was told when he arrived on the set to just keep on doing Abe Lincoln, which he does. He is entertaining. These stars -- we hold them in high public trust. It's how Hollywood does it to us, it's the American way: we elect similar men to be President, etc. Glamour and the public eye have a lesser part in the real armed forces, but who cares? We have the all-stars.

> "...The first bombs laid on Tokyo knocked me out of my seat. I spilled my Coke. But I didn't care. I was experiencing all the actualities of total war..."

The film is well made. who knows better how to make the "war film" than we do (I say pridefully). So many hours spent at the editing tables (well spent), so many cameras to get on film the incredibly wide scope of action a battle at sea involves. The job is done, and well done.

And I like Sensurround. The first bombs laid on Tokyo knocked me out of my seat. I spilled my Coke. But I didn't care. I was experiencing all the actualities of total war.

Republicans are in chaos and there will be the first united government in eight years. An old campaigner learns the phases of an election: we are in the "primaries ain't so bad after all" phase now, quickly turning into the "Who's the choice for vice president?" phase, succeeded by the convention whoopla and, ultimately, the euphoric night when, thank God, it's all over. If Ford or Reagan win there will be more divided government: if Carter wins there will be a honeymoon with Congress when he can, if he knows what he wants, get most of it enacted -- that is the test, the time to be bold and innovative. After that the media will traditionally start snapping and biting again.

It will be easy to fault a Carter Administration, we guess; how long can a face be fresh, or a newcomer be "anti-Washington" who is part of Washington? Our guess, too, is that the big Carter Federal reorganization program will bog down if attempted; it strikes us as a gimmick; it's been tried before with little success. On the other hand, if Jimmy Carter actually has reform plans -- a minumum income for the working and non-working poor (its in the new Democratic platform) a national health insurance program, hand-gun registration and affairs like that, there could be a brief, favorable legislative interval such as comes to few presidents.

We suspect Carter will be more literal than is commonly supposed. There is a ring to that speech he have as governor on Law Day, May 4, 1974 to the legal big shots at the University of Georgia, now reprinted. It was a speech, quietly delivered, challenging "the powerful and the influential" to unfreeze the status quo. He told them to their faces that anybody who had lived in the south the last 15 or 20 years must feel "some degree of embarrassment" at the archaic county-unit system, that excluded poor white voters, at the "30 questions" put to blacks who demanded the right to vote and who were disqualified by the intricacy of the information demanded -- "a subterfuge that we had evolved to keep black citizens from voting and which we used with a great deal of smirking pride." He told them smoothly with that toothy smile -- the first speech he ever made in the Georgia Senate was against this system. Yes, he told, them, a black man who sold pencils at the outer door of the Sumter County Courthouse could make a better judgement "about who ought to be sheriff than two highly educated professors at Georgia Southwestern College."

Quite a speech. Time correspondent Stanley Cloud, who has followed Carter throughout, suspects that, "conservatives may feel deceived when they discover Carter's basic liberalism that borders on populism." Maybe.

FROZEN ASSETS:

America buys Alaska.

ONLY $7 MILLION DOWN.

Ice cubes and penguins.

That's what most folks thought Alaska had to offer back in 1867 when Secretary of State Seward suggested we purchase it.

But thanks to thousands of Americans who invested in U.S. securities, we had the down payment on hand.

Take stock in America.

200 years at the same location.

That's recruiting, part II

By Jim Walser

The 1975-76 basketball season at the University of South Carolina was at least as distasteful for Frank McGuire as it was for the state fans who bitched and moaned their way through it with him.

Even before the season began, as long ago as the first pre-season practice on October 15, McGuire confided to reporters that the season would be pretty much a losing proposition. "There's no way you can win these days without a big man," McGuire said. "You play too many other teams that have them, and they'll exploit that weakness on us all year."

The cause of McGuire's concern was the precipitous departure of moody Tom Boswell, the 6-9 center from '74-'75, who signed a $125,000 contract with the Boston Celtics after his junior year and left the local heroes somewhat lacking down the middle. They paid for that sin repeatedly last season, as big guys like Marquette's Bo Ellis played handball off the offensive and defensive backboards.

Never again, McGuire vowed, after Boswell passed around word of his change of plans. "We're gonna recruit some good ones," McGuire predicted. "I don't want to be in this shape again."

And he apparently won't be, at least not for a couple of years. McGuire's 1976 recruiting efforts eventually put him in solid contention for two of the nation's best high school prospects -- 6-9 Jim Graziano of Farmingdale, N.Y. and 6-8 Jonathan Moore of Charleston. McGuire signed Graziano, and finished a close second to Furman's Joe Williams with Moore. Had he signed both, McGuire would have been in great shape. But with only Graziano aboard, the results are somewhat harder to evaluate.

At Furman, the arrival of Moore and several other solid prospects will leave coach Joe Williams in a greatly strengthened position as he contemplates the last year of Southern Conference competition--at least as the league has been constructed in the last 15 years. Richmond, East Carolina, VMI, William and Mary, and Davidson will all vacate the league after next season.

Over at Clemson, the legacy of Tates Locke lives on, two years after the head coach helped the school onto a three-year NCAA probation before departing for fame and glory as current head coach of the NBA's Buffalo (?) Braves. That legacy consists of some good basketball players -- and a limited chance for his successor Bill Foster, to improve the club because of the inherited recruiting limitations resulting from Locke's crimes. The biggest story of Clemson's recruiting year came on May 30 when 7-1 center Tree Rollins decided to stay in school instead of following Locke to the NBA via the late, great "hardship draft" of undergraduates. With Rollins in school Clemson is assured of respectability in the Atlantic Coast Conference, although it is hard to see how much improvement will be possible over last year's team which won a school record 18 games.

The full wrap-up on the state's Big Three follows:

USC: In addition to finding a big man of some quality, McGuire faces the task of replacing four-year participants like Alex English, Mike Dunleavy, Bob Mathias, and Mark Greiner.

Ironically, in the spring of 1972 that foursome (plus two who departed before playing at USC) had been called by some writers "the best recruiting crop in the nation." Now, the 1976 freshmen-in-waiting are being called by the South Carolina press and by McGuire "the best recruits since the Roche-Owens recruiting season."

But if there's one thing local fandom has learned, it's to be wary of the recruiting stories, which usually grow in reverse proportion of the previous year's results. Thus, they are very big this particular summer.

Other than Graziano, who seems from all reports to be an interesting type (his ambition is to be a rock journalist), the field is limited to one widely accepted recruit. That would be 6-6 Karlton Hilton, junior college transfer from Anderson College, who seems to be the big scorer and consistent rebounder that will be needed to replace English.

Then there is 6-8 Mark Connaughton, a forward, who led metro Cincinnati in rebounding and also ranked high is scoring. But Connaughton will be coming to Carolina off an injury that kept him out of action for the last half of his senior season, and it's unclear how much that will bother him as a freshman.

The other recruits are 6-2 guard Kenny Reynolds, 6-4 guard Mike Doyle, and 6-7 forward Tom wimbush. Reynolds and Doyle are from the New York area, with Reynolds described as a playmaker and Doyle listed as a "shooter." Wimbush is the least known of the group, averaging 18 points and 13 rebounds a game for Carver High in Montgomery. If one combines the new people with last year's leftovers -- primarily the erratic Nate Davis and the increasingly less erratic Jack Gilloon -- one gets about as unclear a picture as one could imagine coming from the corner of Assembly and Blossom.

It should be an interesting fall practice, to see which of the bunch sink, and which of them swim.

Furman: Just when Joe Williams was getting ready to climb back on top of the Southern Conference, all of the teams he was going to beat began to drop out of the league.

Assuming that Williams can construct a schedule after next season, projections seem rosy. For openers, there's 6-9 sophomore Jim Strickland of Columbia, point guard Ron Smith and much-traveled (Furman-Providence-Furman) Bruce Grimm, a wing forward who becomes eligible in January.

Then there's the much-publicized Moore and 6-6 recruit Dave Dredger from DeMatha High (the Kenny Carr-Austin Carr high school outside of Washington), 6-1 guard Stanley Woods of Atlanta, 6-8 Rich McKinney of Spartanburg and a Florida junior college transfer, 6-5 Rich Harness. That's a wealth of competition to go with other sometimes '75-'76 players like Artie Knight and Steve Whittington.

High-scoring Ray Miller, who didn't like Furman almost as much as his teammates didn't care for him, will be gone, too, an academic casualty. All in all, a good spring for the likeable Williams.

Clemson: Bill Foster didn't need much in the way of recruits, couldn't have signed them even if he had needed them, and ended up not getting much anyway. Two transfers, 6-6 Jim Wells and 6-3 Randy Gray, and one freshman, 6-1 Bob Conrad of Chicago, will be the only newcomers to a cast of Tigers that really didn't need that much help.

With Rome, Abraham, Rollins, David Brown, Jim Howell, Greg Coles, and Derrick Johnson back, job openings were limited. Foster could recruit only two new players, in addition to the transfers, and he has signed only one at this point.

But for next year at least, the Tigers look formidable enough, anyway.

THE Political economy

The old TWUA has fought J.P. Stevens for years, with only limited success. Yet with the merged union, its efforts will carry more weight. Then too, there have been Southern labor union victories in the near past. Textile workers in Roanoke Rapids, North Carolina, and in Statesboro, Georgia have been organized, though there is still court action pending in each case.

Labor unions are not the ideal solution for the protection of the workers. The ideal would be for businessmen to act responsibly and treat workers with a modicum of fairness. But given irresponsible management, and a state government that always sides with the money, a union is really the only hope for prevention of labor exploitation. It is, however, to be hoped that organized labor will be better than management has been, that it will be responsible. But this is usually the case in this country. For instance, the various national wage and price guideposts and guidlines and controls over the last 15 years failed precisely because while organized labor adhered to the guidelines, management did not.

Labor unions, if not always positive goods, are surely the lesser of the evils.
